She picks up. 'I'm on the side of the road, there was a really bad car accident, a guy said. He told her he found her number in the injured man's phone. Rebecca knew her father was driving, and in a panic she asked if it was him: Is it Brian? Is your name Brian? could she hear the man asking. If this problem isn't solved, we come close to the death of the phone call. He told her it was. He bleeds a lot, he added. Then the man told her that if she didn't immediately sent him money, he would let her father die. I stopped mid-sob, she said. She suspected it was a scam and was hanging up. Still, many people end up sharing financial information on the phone. More than $9 billion was lost from phone scams in 2017, up from $7.4 billion in according to a company trying to curb such issues, Truecaller.More than 7 million complaints were called at the National Don't Register last year, to the Federal Trade Commission. Phone scams are currently one of the major problems, said Adam Doupe, associate director of the Center for Cybersecurity and Digital Forensics at Arizona State University. They're much more effective than email scams. The growth of the phone scam is, in part, thanks to a new tactic these criminals use that makes people more likely to answer their calls, and then trust them once they do. Scammers are increasingly spoofing phone numbers to make them look familiar to you. They can use your area code or the first six digits of a friend's phone number. Half of all phone scams today use this tactic of digit spoofing, according to a recent analysis by Hiya, a phone spam protection company. Now most people's primary line of defense is being challenged against these dangerous calls — simply not to pick up the phone if they don't recognize the number. One of the key flaws in the current phone system is this fact that spammers can spoof the caller ID, Doupe said. He said older people are particularly at risk. The phone is their main form of communication, he said. When they get a scam call, they're more likely to take it at face value. Once they get you on the line, these spammers often use sensational tactics. They'll make people believe there's a warrant for their arrest, tell them they owe money to the IRS or that a relative is in danger. For them, it's just a business, said Jonathan Nelson, director of product management at Hiya.And that sense of urgency is vulnerable and more likely to hand over financial information, he said. Unable to derail if it's friend or foe on the other line, many people have dismantling with answering the phone all together, Nelson said. If this problem isn't solved, we come close to the death of the phone call, he said. What you can do If a consumer doesn't feel they expect any calls, just don't answer, Nelson said. The caller can always leave a voicemail. If a number looks familiar, but something looks down, tell the person you'll call them back. If the call was legal, you should be able to reach them in an outbound call. A number of apps - Hiya, Truecaller, YouMail, and Nomorobo - allow you to block and filter spam calls. You can also call your name at the National Don't Register. Often it's someone who tries to trick you into giving them valuable information and money, said Amy Nofziger, a fraud expert at AARP. Do not give any personal information over the phone.
